Planning Finding Aid

The Town & Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1947 set up County Council planning committees and required county councils and town councils of large towns to prepare development plans to be approved by Dept of Health for Scotland. The Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 transferred the planning function to District Councils but also gave Regional Councils responsibility for strategic planning. Regional Councils therefore were responsible for Structure Plans which covered the whole region and which were intended to give a long term strategy, while District Councils were responsible for Local Plans focusing on discrete areas but which followed the strategy set in the Structure Plan.

Structure Plans and Local Plans together set out how much development will be permitted and where, and also where development will not be allowed. Transport, shopping, recreation, employment, conservation and archaeological issues are factors, and there is wide consultation with the general public, with specialist interests and neighbouring councils.

Within this context, alterations and additions to existing housing, new housing developments, industrial developments and all aspects of planning are dealt with by the planning application process.

Falkirk Archives holds Planning Application files, 1975-1989. These are not listed. For access to these files, please contact Falkirk Council Development Management
